"There are some key things that you need in any plan to get a bill that is viable, it's got to be tax reform without raising taxes," Hatch told conservative activists. "If people don't pass legislation that makes these changes, then we'll be there to tell the American people next election year that those provisions in the bill didn't pay for themselves."

Hatch reiterated his previous comments that the bill will not be as politically palatable as a tax overhaul that eliminates or changes Obamacare, since its passage would be contingent on a large number of Democratic votes -- especially from vulnerable Republicans.. Hatch cited the costs associated with the Affordable Care Act's insurance markets -- a tax increase that was projected to cost $700 billion per year -- as something lawmakers should consider over cutting benefits..
